BOWLING

Ugh, the creative cave man, sat in front of his cave home and gazed longingly down at the little stream flowing across the floor of the valley below his residence.

"I wish I had a pond in my front yard like the pond, ten rock throws down stream. With a pond down there I could grow my own lilies and I wouldn't have to walk through the jungle fifty times a day to look at the beautiful things."

This dream to grow water lilies had been eating Ugh ever since he first discovered the flowering plants on one of his hunting trips. The first time he had seen the bright flowers bobbing on the surface of the little pond he thought they were the eyes of some water monster lurking beneath the surface. With a roar he dashed into the water to attack them with full cave man fury. The battle over, he looked around to see if his anger had left any pieces of the water beast big enough to take back to his cave for dinner. He was amazed to find his foe was nothing but a few green and white shreds of plant life.

"I have discovered water lilies," he thought to himself. "I have discovered water lilies and destroyed them before I figured out what they were good for."

Saddened by his hasty action, he knew man would never get anywhere if he kept destroying things so carelessly. He looked around the pond and spotted, under a pond-side bush, one water lily that had escaped his attack. Picking up the flower, he gazed at its beauty and was thrilled to find that it smelled nice too.

Without Ugh realizing it, man had jumped forward. The first spark of the love of beauty had been kindled in his hairy chest. Never again would he be able to look at the world around him in the same way as before.

A frantic search uncovered several other undamaged water lilies and he gathered them up and ran all the way back to his cave. With a sharp slab of stone he scooped out a hole in the ground beside the cave entrance and planted them. He sat back to admire man's first attempt at landscaping and was horrified as he watched them wither and die in the hot sun.

"Ugh! I'm stupid! They don't grow in dirt, they grow in water." To prove how stupid he knew he was, he picked up a large rock and hit himself several times on the head.

It took several days to locate more water lilies and he almost starved doing it, because in his search for beauty he neglected to hunt for food. When he did find more plants, he carefully pulled them from the water and carried them back to the little stream in front of his cave. The water in his front yard ran very swiftly and as fast as he planted them they washed away. This was when he realized he must have a pond.

How to build a pond was beyond Ugh's weak brain power. The best he could do was rush up and down the stream, waving his club, demanding the water to 'pool' itself. Every day he spent several hours in this fruitless activity. It never did any good but it made him feel more man-like to do it.

"It's time to give that ol' water another blast," he thought to himself as he sat in front of his cave on the day we're telling about.

Waving his club and yelling his orders for the stream to make a pond, he dashed down the hill toward the stream. He had thought up some new words to yell so he wasn't paying too much attention to where he was going. His toe caught a large rock and the cave man went flying through the air to land with a crash, flat on his face with his body across the stream.

Because his head had split a large boulder when he landed, the cave man had been knocked out. It was some time before he regained consciousness. When he did, he was amazed to see that the stream had obeyed him and made a pool. He jumped up and the pool ran away. He lay down and the pool came back. The lucky fall had taught man how to build a dam!

Even Ugh's small brain quickly substituted a log for his body and the happy cave man had his own lily pond!
